

Graduate Programs in Communication Studies

Introduction

The graduate program in Communication Studies is designed to give students a theoretical understanding of the functions, structures, and processes of human communication. Students will specialize in one of the following aspects of communication: (a) psychological nature of interpersonal communication; (b) mediated communication and societal issues; (c) role of language in human communication; and (d) cross-cultural communication among people with different values and perspectives. The graduate program emphasizes empirical and scientific approaches to issues involved in human communication. Through developing knowledge of and skills in quantitative and qualitative research methods, students will acquire the tools for conducting their own research.
